CRIO Examples

4D Discover phase. Tuned for Swire Properties.

Three worked prompts you can copy, adjust, and paste into Copilot. Each uses the CRIO pattern: Context, Role, Interview, Output. The Interview step is the one most people skip. Let the AI ask you questions before it answers.

1. Tenant at risk

USE WHEN

A flagship tenant is signaling possible non-renewal and you need to prep a response.

PROMPT

Context.

I am a senior leasing or tenant experience lead at Swire Properties in Hong Kong. One of our top ten tenants at Taikoo Place, a global financial services firm occupying 120,000 square feet across two buildings, has gone quiet. They were one of the most engaged clients in our portfolio when I took this account over three years ago. Over the last quarter they have stopped responding to my outreach in the usual way. Their space planning review, originally scheduled for last month, has been postponed twice with no new date given. A new regional head arrived from London six weeks ago and has not taken any of my meeting invitations. I have heard indirectly that they have started looking at space at Landmark in Central. Their lease expires in nine months. The fit out we delivered four years ago is showing its age and they have not raised any capex request. Internally this renewal is on our board risk register because of its size.

Role.

Act as a seasoned Hong Kong commercial real estate tenant retention expert with twenty years of Grade A office experience.

Interview.

Now, ask me 3 questions to understand the deeper context. Ask one question at a time.

Output.

Once I have answered, produce a one page retention brief with the three most likely root causes ranked by probability, a recommended first move, and three talking points for my next conversation with the tenant. Explain your thinking and your reasoning.

2. Fuzzy new initiative

USE WHEN

You have been asked to lead something new and you are not sure where to start.

PROMPT

Context.

I am a manager or director at Swire Properties. Three weeks ago my business unit head asked me to lead our response to an industry shift. Grade A office demand has softened, hybrid working is now the norm among our best tenants, and the traditional lease model is under pressure. The board wants to see a point of view by end of Q3. I have been asked to lead this because I have range, not because I have done anything like it before. There is no internal playbook. I have not been given a team, a budget, or a clear definition of done. My sponsor thinks this is a six month piece of work. I suspect it is closer to eighteen. The initiative is high visibility and I know two other directors quietly wanted this role.

Role.

Act as an experienced change leader who has rolled out similar initiatives inside large Hong Kong conglomerates.

Interview.

Now, ask me 3 questions to understand the deeper context. Ask one question at a time.

Output.

Once I have answered, produce a one page initiative outline with a suggested three phase approach with rough timing, the top three risks and how to mitigate them, and a stakeholder map showing who I must engage early. Explain your thinking and your reasoning.

3. Difficult conversation prep

USE WHEN

A team member's work has slipped and you need to prepare for the conversation.

PROMPT

Context.

I have a direct report at Swire Properties who has been with my team for four years. Steady performer, well liked by peers, and someone I promoted into a senior role eighteen months ago. They have always been the kind of person who would stay late to get something right. Over the last quarter something has shifted. Two deliverables have missed their deadlines. The quality on a board paper last month was below our standard and I had to rework large parts of it myself. Peers have started quietly routing around them on cross team work. I do not know if something is going on outside work. I have not raised any of this with them yet. We have a 1 on 1 scheduled for later this week and I want to use it. I am worried about either going in too soft and losing my chance, or going in too hard and damaging a relationship I value.

Role.

Act as an experienced executive coach who has prepared hundreds of leaders for tough conversations.

Interview.

Now, ask me 3 questions to understand the deeper context. Ask one question at a time.

Output.

Once I have answered, produce a one page conversation plan with a suggested opening, two or three likely pushbacks and how to respond to each, my walkaway position, and one sentence I should have ready if the conversation gets heated. Explain your thinking and your reasoning.

4. Strategic reset under pressure

USE WHEN

Your portfolio is losing ground and the team needs a new commercial strategy.

PROMPT

Context.

I lead a team inside one of Swire Properties' commercial business units. Over the last twelve months our market share in Grade A office leasing in our core district has dropped from thirty four percent to twenty six percent. Margins have compressed as we have offered longer rent free periods and heavier capex contributions to hold onto existing tenants. A new competitor, a joint venture between a mainland developer and a regional family office, has launched a 1.4 million square foot premium development five minutes from our flagship asset. They are quoting rents fifteen percent below ours and offering tenants shorter, more flexible leases with built in expansion options. We have already lost two major tenants to them and a third is in active conversation. My team is split. Some want to compete on price, some want to double down on service and amenity, and some think we need to reposition into a different segment entirely. I have eight weeks to present a strategic direction to my business unit head. The team is nervous. I have my own instinct about where to go but I do not want to push it until the team has done its own thinking.

Role.

Act as a seasoned commercial real estate strategy advisor who has led similar portfolio resets in markets with new entrants and compressing margins.

Interview.

Now, ask me 3 questions to understand the deeper context. Ask one question at a time.

Output.

Once I have answered, produce a one page strategic reset brief with a one paragraph diagnosis of what is actually happening, three strategic options with the rough tradeoffs of each, a recommended direction, and a plan for how I should take my team through this decision so they own the outcome. Explain your thinking and your reasoning.

FACILITATOR TIP

Use these during the Discover phase of the 4D Framework, when you are trying to understand the situation deeply before deciding. The Interview step is where the real value comes from. If you skip it, you are just prompting. If you use it, the AI becomes a thinking partner.
